

The fourth edition of American Women examines the many dimensions of women's lives as the first decade of the 21st century comes to a close. Included in its pages are all-important demographic data showing the size of the female population, its changing age distribution, rising educational attainment, and evolving racial composition. New to this edition is a chapter that compares the attitudes of women and men on a number of important issues and examines how their attitudes differ by age. Also included is a chapter profiling women's time use based on the Bureau of Labor Statistics invaluable American Time Use Survey. You also get labor force projections from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, statistics on women's incomes and living arrangements, and population projections from the Census Bureau. While the government collected most of the data presented in American Women, its data tables are not reprints from government reports as is the case in many reference books and reports. New Strategists editors spent hundreds of hours scouring web sites, compiling numbers into meaningful statistics, and creating tables with calculations that reveal the trends.
